Exports Always in Demand.

Two facts are already demonstrated by the history of technical schools. First, the training is of practical value, and is fitted for immediate entrance upon their professional work. Moreover, under present conditions the student is practically guaranteed a position on graduation—a matter of moment to the young man who cannot spend more than four years in the pursuit of higher studies. Second, the training is broad enough to fit men to adjust themselves to new conditions and to rise in their professions. —Saturday Evening Post.
